

NO EVIL PROJECT @ WACHUSETT REGIONAL HIGH SCHOOL

MIA

I donate blood every 6 months to American Red Cross Association and have been doing so since I turned 16. Because of my O Positive blood it's extremely valuable to hospitals and patients around the country!

KEITH

I try my best to be nice to everyone and help out anyone in need.

LINDSAY

I volunteer to teach art and music to children at a summer camp.

Wachusett Regional High School's National Art Honor Society has been working with the No Evil Project for their latest exhibit. Over several days, nearly 300 students, teachers, and staff were photographed, and the students used the images and writings to create an exhibit in the school's Bowes Gallery. Many of the pieces will only be seen in the physical exhibit. The gallery is open during school hours through February 6th.

About the No Evil Project

The goal of the project is to redefine stereotypes and show that people aren't defined by their labels. Created by Troy B. Thompson, over 3,000 people have now been photographed for the project posing as the three wise monkeys – See No Evil, Hear No Evil, and Speak No Evil. Each person chooses three labels that represent themselves, from race to religion to sexuality to occupation to politics to favorite sports team. Then they write a good deed, big or small, to show that they're "not evil" despite the negative stereotypes people may have about those labels.

In addition to encouraging people to talk about labels and stereotypes and find commonality, the project has been used at organizations to explore diversity as well as anti-bullying. Anyone can participate in the project at public events or through the website. Participation is fun, encourages introspection on taboo topics, and has given many participants a voice to tell their story.

The Wachusett exhibit is the fourth physical exhibit of the project, with a major exhibit featuring over 1,000 participants planned for Spring 2015.
